WSG Exhibition: Ephemeral

Greater Reston Arts Center (GRACE)
Reston Town Center, 2001 Market St, #103,
Reston VA

This WSG exhibition is held in conjunction with The Greater Reston Arts Center. In keeping with the temporary installation by sculptor Patrick Dougherty erected outside the GRACE gallery, Ephemeral explores the nature of non-permanent, three-dimensional work addressing the concept of ephemerality, whether conceptually, through site-specific works, or through the nature of the materials (see page 10).

President’s Letter: WSG Picnic

Dear Members,

It was lovely to see new and old members at the WSG Annual Potluck. As always, it was well attended with up to 50 guests on a hot summer day at beautiful Rainbow Hill in Maryland. It was a warm welcome having our sister group from the Baltimore Sculptors among our special guests.

It was very interesting to hear about each other’s artistic projects and visions for the future that brings us as a group closer together.

Thank you to all guests who partied, brought delicious food, and volunteered to make this picnic a true pleasure and joy.

I am looking forward to staying in touch with you, and please come back next year!

Cheers,

Artemis Herber

Washington Sculptors Group Commemorates International Sculpture Day

On April 24, 2015, the Washington Sculptors Group (WSG) conducted a panel discussion moderated by Judith Pratt highlighting its exhibition, Brick Layers, at the Workhouse Arts Center in Lorton, Virginia. Brick Layers was juried by Philadelphia artist/activist Jennie Shanker.

In celebration of International Sculpture Day, WSG sculptors Fabiola Alvarez Yurcisin, Anna Dabney Smith, and David Grainger discussed the relevance of their work in relation to the history of the Workhouse through a dialogue with Workhouse historians Irma Clifton and Eleanor Lally. The Workhouse Arts Center (WAC) occupies a unique historic site, originally the Occoquan Workhouse, which opened in 1910 as a federal prison.

The Brick Layers panel discussion humanized the Workhouse history, and supported conversation about themes that remain relevant to this day such as the criminal justice system, women’s rights, the Constitution, workers and labor rights, as well as issues of race, class, and gender.

A multinational audience shared experiences from their lives, underscoring the ongoing importance of this exhibition with Washington DC-area residents. Brick Layers was on view at the Workhouse Arts Center April 1–June 28, 2015.

Land&Art@MARC

Land&Art@MARC: A 4 Season Project, is a collaboration between MARC (The Maryland Agricultural Resource Council) and WSG to develop and realize land art and land use projects through the four seasons of the year, with the primary concentration on farming and agricultural issues. The focus is on cycles in nature, farming, and the cosmos on this 149-acre Piedmont farm located in central Baltimore County.

The first of four calls was Landscape and Structure for which the work of Pattie Porter Firestone and Mike Shaffer were selected.

Pattie Porter Firestone’s Leaves of Grass portrays seen and unseen patterns of energy in the natural world. Leaves of Grass depicts energy from the earth pushing five red blades of grass 8 feet out of the ground. The color and size gives pause to very familiar forms.

Mike Shaffer’s Uncle Mike’s Animal House is made from recycled construction lumber and stands about seven feet high. The concept is based on cage-like structures used by farmers in the frontier days to protect small animals such as sheep and goats from bears and other wild animals, especially at night. Actual “houses” (pens) of this sort would have been crudely made with straight logs, perhaps closer together, and with a flat or sloping roof and probably with a door or gate. The gabled roof on this work makes the structure look more like a house, but would probably have been considered an unnecessary feature on early frontier homesteads.

The second call was Equinox – Cycles In Nature. Jenn DePalma’s sculptures, Cubes, were selected for this second call.

DePalma will work at MARC for a week or so installing as many 2x2x2 foot cubes as possible. Cubes will consist of corn stalks harvested on site, brush from the pile of sticks and logs, manure found locally, sunflowers harvested on site, wood chips, hay, earth and other materials found on site. The materials are tamped into a form and then the form is completely removed. The pieces are held together simply from the tamping. Over time the cube degrades; how quickly the cube degrades depends completely on the materials, weather, and environment.

The effort integrates actions related to farming, the harvest, collection, and storage of materials. Weather and time push the narrative of lost perfection, and the whole work spins on thinking inside the box. Volunteers who help build the pieces and viewers who attend opening day will experience the climactic moment when the form is removed and the cube remains. Viewers will be able to quietly observe the slow disintegration, literally sometimes watching pine needles fall from the cube or the wind blowing away a leaf or two.

The third call for sculptures is called The Barn. Your are invited to submit images (see below).

Jenn DePalma, Cubes, made from various materials found on site. Each cube will be 2x2x2 feet.

Jeffrey Cooper has accomplished what many in his position have yearned to do: after 38 years of a successful career (teaching mathematics at the University of Maryland) he has creatively dealt with the “what next” issue. Drawing on two seemingly disparate streams in his makeup, the concrete and the abstract, he turned to creating sculpture. He learned how to use woodworking tools from his grandfather who did home remodeling. The precision and logicality of mathematics guides the nature of his sculpture. If woodworking and abstract thinking produced his aesthetic, then Foon Sham was the midwife. A couple of years before his retirement in 2008, Jeff read an article on Foon and was motivated to take a course with him. And that was the beginning.

Jeff’s work is abstract, quiet, controlled, mostly additive, and frequently is built of a sequential similarity of shapes. Many pieces produce a visual tension wherein a seeming imbalance fools the eye, but a surreptitious nudge shows the work to be solidly grounded. He has also completed some carved pieces, which he has floated on lengths of rebar. His work mode is to make preliminary sketches and then let the piece vary itself as he builds.

This year VisArts provided him his first solo show. Jeff has also shown in several WSG...after 38 years of a successful career (teaching mathematics at the University of Maryland) he has creatively dealt with the “what next” issue.

Small-scale sculptural work by members of the Washington Sculptors Group (WSG) will communicate a global perspective on aspects of monumental phenomena. Participating artist’s work will convey a global perspective that is informed either by their own personal background (e.g., familial, immigrant origins, travels, etc.), or by experiences with other cultures and peoples internationally or locally. Their global perspectives create references for MICRO-MONUMENTS.

juried exhibits. In addition to Foon Sham, he cites Martin Puryear and David Smith as stylistic influences. Having completed one career, Jeff is well embarked on a second.

Famous mid-19th-century mathematician James Sylvester is quoted as saying, “The fine arts are four: plastic [pliable, moldable], lyric [poetic], music, and mathematic.” So Jeff is batting 500! His studio is at the home he shares with artist wife Rebecca Hirsh, a space they enlarged in 2004.

Artemis Herber works in a house of art. In fact, her studio consists of many high-ceilinged rooms with ample light from tall windows in a mansion located in Owings Mills MD. The rooms are filled with her paintings and sculpture in various stages of completion. Walking and talking with Artemis, one is immediately made aware of her energy and of her total commitment to her art. At the same time she is good natured and warm. She came here with her husband from Germany in 2002.

She studied art at the University of Paderborn in North Rhine-Westphalia where she won a number of prizes. She also received awards for her projects in art education. During this period she was attracted to American Minimalism and European Arte Povera. It was there that she found her medium of choice, corrugated cardboard, after experimenting with various kinds of paper. The corrugated cardboard sheets that were used to protect the tables in the art department turned out to be perfect. The cardboard is easily scored and bent. It is also important to Artemis that this medium be made of recycled materials, which in turn can be recycled again. Much of her work, both painting, and sculpture, starts with 8x8 sheets we only think of as being used in packing more valuable items. Most people who know Artemis are familiar with her sculptures which are produced by bending the cardboard into forms that resemble serpentine walls.

But another group of pieces are related to her view that the role of the artist in society is to challenge and provoke the viewer into an awareness of important issues. Climate change is one of them. Scientists have recently coined the term “anthropocene” to denote the time period in which man’s activities have begun to have a substantial effect on the environment. For many scientists this period began with the industrial revolution. In 1884, artist and critic John Ruskin spoke about the “dry, black veil of dust” that hung over London. Artemis conveys her own concerns by making paintings that are often abstractions of landscapes, industrial and rural, that never contain human figures. These images are often very colorful, but a feeling of emptiness pervades them. Some of these paintings become sculpture if she wets the cardboard. Tearing and cutting, she deforms the surface to produce a three-dimensional figure. The result is not always predictable. Other pieces are made using both cardboard and heavy paper. The painting here is done to produce a surface that looks like rusted metal.

Artemis’ work has been shown frequently in the Baltimore-Washington area. Recently, she was awarded a solo show at the WIP Gallery at Artisphere in Arlington, Virginia. Her work has also been shown in locations throughout the United States and Europe. In addition to her busy schedule of creating and showing new artwork, she is now president of the Washington Sculptors Group, where she has raised the energy level, introducing new opportunities for members to exhibit their work in public settings and internationally.

Marvelous Objects: Surrealist Sculpture from Paris to New York starts October 29, 2015, and ends February 2016. This is the first major exhibition devoted to a comprehensive view of the movement’s three-dimensional works. Valerie Fletcher, senior curator, says: This exhibition reveals the totality of surrealist sculpture by highlighting two main approaches. Organic abstraction originated with the whimsical reliefs of Jean Arp and inspired many artists including Henry Moore, Joan Miro and Isamu Noguchi. Found-object assemblages, which originated in Marcel Duchamp’s Assisted Readymade, became a surrealist passion.

Ponte Zingola Studio and Apartment Available in Italy
Craig Schaffer has two guest apartments available for rent in the town of Pietrasanta, near Carrara, Italy, from Spring through Fall. He can also offer studio space for painting or small sculpture. Or, he can refer artists to a nearby facility for large-scale sculpture. The rates for 2016 are 650 euros/week, plus cleaning fee, for a 3-bedroom unit and 350 euros/week, plus cleaning fee, for a 1-bedroom unit. Both units have full kitchens, internet access, and use of our marble ping pong table, garden, and river where we cool off regularly during the summer months.

Craig says: “I found this beautiful spot while in graduate school. Initially, I spoke little Italian, but with the prevailing informal yet intense attitude toward the work, and the friendliness of the locals and the sculptors, I had never felt so at home.”

Visit the website at www.pontezingola.com. To inquire about availability or for further information about visiting Ponte Zingola, or about Italy in general, members can contact me at schaffer.sculpture@gmail.com.

Artomatic October 2015
Would you like to exhibit at Artomatic? A few WSG members are planning on exhibiting in Artomatic in October at 8100 Corporate Drive, Hyattsville MD, right near New Carrollton Metro. If you are interested, e-mail Gloria Chapa at gloriaidachapa@gmail.com.

This is a very interactive, well-publicized and attended community event. It is a great opportunity to display your work to a large audience. Plans are now being firmed up. Visit the Artomatic Facebook page where pictures of the interior of the office building are posted. Schedules for choosing spaces, volunteering, events, etc., can be best accessed on the FB page. All are welcome!

Since 1999, Artomatic (artomatic.org) has been one of the most popular art festivals in the DC metro area. The DC Commission on the Arts is one of its biggest supporters. Artomatic’s goal is to sponsor a huge non-juried art happening, usually in a commercial site slated for demolition or newly constructed and not yet occupied.
