President’s Letter: Micro-Monuments

Dear Friends,

The opening reception of Micro-Monuments on December 17th at the Salzland Museum was awesome. Finally we came to a successful end after more than one year of preparation.

With all your support, hard work, and true commitment the transatlantic project between WSG and the Salzland Museum was highlighted by the opening reception. Very dear and special guests came to celebrate with us, including warm welcome notes expressed by Dr. Schellenberger and beautiful music from Ms. Koch accompanied by two students playing piano, violin, and guitar.

I am grateful to the team who worked closely with me, such as Mathias Kassner from “Rauminhalt” and our co-curator, Dr. Ines Engelmann, who came from Halle. Many others involved with our project, including Mr. Busch and Frank Löbig, deserve our gratitude for their help in planning and organizing the show.

The exhibition was well attended, and the audience was awed by the impressive selection and display of the artwork.

Today, December 18, 2015, I will leave beautiful Schönebeck and those people who became a part of our WSG family. I hope we will stay in touch for future projects.

I wish you in Schönebeck and you in DC the best of luck with our show Micro-Monuments. The exhibition concludes February 28, 2016. Please, take the opportunity to promote the exhibition as often as you can for your purposes.

With warmest regards,

Happy holidays and a successful 2016.

THE BARN, A 4 Season Project
December 5, 2015—February 5, 2016

The BARN marks the third of four calls for LAND&ART@MARC: A 4 Season Project, which underlies collaboration between the Maryland Agricultural Resource Council (MARC) and the Washington Sculptors Group (WSG). The primary focus of this project is to work with local communities pertaining to permaculture meridians and art, eco, as well as agricultural issues. The collaboration seeks to generate a diverse and multilayered program throughout the year that examines the interaction between art, natural eco systems, permaculture principles, and agricultural themes in today’s socially and economically complicated rural landscape. The work presented at MARC investigates environmental issues through collaborative and participatory creative projects with visitors, volunteers, members, and local communities.

The program at MARC was conceived in 2014 when Artemis Herber approached Bronwyn Mitchell, MARC’s program manager, and asked about a possible collaboration with WSG artists that would facilitate an interactive dialogue on Land Art and Land Use projects. Subsequently multiple WSG members, including Tom Petzinkler, Elsabé Dixon, Nizette Brennan, Cat Lukens, and environmental artist Suzanne Desai met with Bronwyn Mitchell and the MARC team to define the parameters of the collaboration.

The program at MARC started with the theme of “Landscape and Structure” in the spring of 2015, and was represented through the very visible large-scale red sculptures of Patti Firestone (Leaves of Grass) and Mike Shaffer (Uncle Mike’s Animal House) in a lush green landscape. Of the two works installed, Mike Shaffer’s piece remains. Each year new sculptures will be installed on a rotation basis. “Equinox-Cycles in Nature,” a summer time-based project was also a social interaction with visitors to MARC. This land installation by the artist Jenny De Palma consisted of multiple large-scale “cubes” constructed on an undulating grass hillside and made out of farm detritus—it can still be viewed as it slowly disintegrates.

The Barn, representing the winter program, is an indoor gallery exhibition that takes place in the goat barn on MARC’s property and transforms an everyday agrarian space into a micro-gallery and art laboratory during the time of the winter season. Artist teams collaborated on diverse ideas that incorporate interdisciplinary objectives, which related to the concept of the barn itself. Artist teams created installations, sculptures, paintings, and multimedia visuals, exploring the theme of the barn with regard to structure, architecture, anthropology (domestication), history, storytelling, agriculture, and other disciplines. These artists viewed the barn, with its eight single stalls and an open central area, as they would a white cube gallery space, and each team was given stalls for their proposed installations.

During the opening reception of the Barn project, WSG President Artemis Herber described the space as: “Atmospherically beautiful with all the quietness detached from traffic noise, the calm breath of the animals, the subtle installations sounds of the artwork such as Dane Winkler’s piece in combination with wholesome materials of straw, tobacco, soil, and juxtapositions of light, neon, foils, and metals. All comes together in a cohesive, rustic, yet contemporary exhibition that transforms the barn into a sublime realm without THE BARN continues on page 10
Tom Petzwinkler’s passion for art is evident immediately. He has an engaging manner that radiates energy. To avoid sounding pretentious, he calls himself an “art worker” rather than an artist.

Photography was his primary interest while he studied at Virginia Commonwealth University in Richmond, one of the best art schools in the country. He remembers it as tough and the atmosphere very stimulating and competitive. His MFA thesis topic, “Behind the Fireline,” illustrates his desire to push the boundaries of what is considered to be art. For six months he embedded himself in the fire department of Hanover, Virginia. He made a photo documentary of the day-to-day work of the crew that showed both the high-energy existence and the, at times, mundane and dull lives they led in both the firehouse and at home.

After graduation Tom taught at several schools including VCU and a seven-year stint at George Mason University. He enjoyed teaching, but became dissatisfied with the constraints of the academic environment. Now he sometimes works at a custom woodworking shop. His output there shows a very high level of craftsmanship, as does the kitchen of his house that he has been remodeling for the last eight years.

In addition to photography, Tom also studied sculpture at VCU. For the last few years he has been interested in combining sculpture with photography, continuing a trend of crossing the boundaries between traditional sculpture and other disciplines.

For his work Extrusion #1, he cut a very large (6 x 10 feet) paper print of a black-and-white photograph of a waterfall into six-inch squares. The paper squares were then transferred, through his proprietary technique using silicone, to a surface resembling a multilayered chessboard with the squares at different heights. The resulting extruded surface looks like a 3D model of a waterfall, but instead of being hung on the wall, it intentionally lies on the floor.

...continuing a trend of crossing the boundaries between traditional sculpture and other disciplines.
Divisions of Perceived Prominence, Internal and External, frame mounted plywood panels with silicon photo transfer, 2 x 10 feet

In another effort, Removal #2, Tom first photographed the wall of a building. The photo was then applied to a sheet of steel that was cut out and literally peeled away from parts of the building. In this way, a 2D image was used to make a 3D sculpture.

In much of his work Tom surprises the viewer by putting in unexpected lines and creases that break the image into many pieces. As a result, the viewer is forced to deal with the tension between what he expects to see, and the actual image. To see more of his work you can visit his website at www.tompetzphoto.com.

Tom joined WSG in 2005, and is currently a member of the board. He worked closely with Artemis Herber in producing the Micro-Monuments show. He was also involved in managing the exhibits at the Maryland Agricultural Resource Council. We look forward to his providing WSG with more of his energy and innovative ideas.
Stepping into Charles Bergen’s studio warms the heart on a wintry day—even the chill outside cannot diminish the whimsy pervading the air. An orange octopus just inside the entry aside shelves lined with maquettes and finished pieces capturing aquatic sea life creates a zoological backdrop. Elsewhere large wood planks standing like sentries are joined by a bucket of salvaged flooring, belying the artist’s interest in wood as a sculptural medium. In between the two areas are tools, found objects and one oddly charming Great Blue Heron whose head is fashioned from a golf club. This doesn’t feel like your “typical” studio!

Bergen, a member of the Monroe Street Market’s Artswalk community, has a passion for sculpture, but he is no mere sculptor. Rather, he’s an instigator, a nostalgist—the CFO (chief fun organizer) of a corporation of one. His light-hearted approach to art making is linked to the fact that Bergen has, slightly later in life, made the fine arts his second career. This decision has far-reaching implications both in how he approaches his artistic process, and the emotional feelings his sculptures manifest in viewers’ eyes.

Bergen has always had an interest in the fine arts, but as a young man, couldn’t visualize how to turn that into a career. Born in DC, he attended Yale University, noting, “Yale wasn’t a place where people made stuff.” His choice to study architecture was apt, as it allowed him to exercise a degree of artistry within his daily work. His interest in fine art practices was relegated to the level of hobby, but has always percolated below the surface.

As the practice of architecture changed over time, so too, he notes, has the role and relevancy of public art. Public sculpture installations have become more visible in our region, buoyed by a rise in private and public funding. Bergen saw opportunities to combine his business acumen with this love of sculpture, and in early 2013 began his transition from full-time employment at an architecture firm to a self-employed, full-time fine artist. His first works have primarily been commissioned, site-specific installations, but that is changing as his artistic practice quickly evolves.

Today the artist has unleashed his creativity, relishing in a newfound sense of possibility. This is borne out by his unbridled use of materials, where everything from iron to stone to wood is fair game. Even found objects can be imbued with new purpose, as an arched, metal floor lamp in the studio’s corner attests. A sense of exploration and playfulness abounds, as the artist delves into his work.

Bergen’s subject matter also bears out this new zest for exploration. Many of his works and installations to date incorporate... animal figures, especially animals found in or around bodies of water. When I ask him about the rationale behind this, I can almost see his mind’s eye travel back in time. “As a kid, they [sea creatures] seemed so magical—so different than day-to-day life in DC.” While he’s certainly willing to produce figurative sculpture (which he proposed as a finalist for the Chuck Brown Memorial), he is drawn more to the variety of shapes found in the animal kingdom. Bergen notes he enjoys the challenge of portraying the “essence” of the animal without necessarily being literal with regard to form.

These animal forms often reveal a reverence for ecology, and a call to rebalance our relationship with nature. At times this ecological link can be overt, as with his CHEARS Bog Turtle sculpture co-commissioned by the City of Greenbelt MD, and the Chesapeake Education, Arts and Research Society. This work, placed in Greenbelt’s Schrom Hills Park, is designed and scaled to engage with children, encouraging them to examine how they interact with nature. His first-ever solo show in May 2015 at the Hollingsworth Art Gallery at the Patuxent National Wildlife Visitor Center in Laurel MD, continued his exploration of the environment with twelve sculptures representing endangered or at-risk species within the Chesapeake Bay watershed.

Even works without overtly environmental messages still tweak the way we experience nature. Coppa’ Lobsta’, first exhibited at the North Bennington Outdoor Sculpture Show in North Bennington, Vermont, literally invites children of all ages to climb on board. Created from copper and salvaged wood, the work—one of his largest to date—quietly encourages us to think about the environment while stimulating dynamic play. Closer to home, his Capitalsaurus Chasing a Falcarius, part of Capitol Hill’s Alphabet Artwork Project, encourages us to think about the history of our environment. Created from water jet cut aluminum, the work hangs from a lamppost at First and F Streets, SE, and references the ecological history of the immediate area (there is indeed a real Capitalsaurus—its bones were unearthed at Capitol Hill’s Garfield Park in 1998) in a way that both teaches and inspires.

Three years into his new career, Bergen seems to be on a roll. Small-scale works will be featured in an exhibition at the Capitol Hill Arts Workshop this January and he recently received a significant grant to create sculptural elements for Dance Place’s new outdoor park in the Brookland neighborhood of DC. While to me it seems as if he’s working in two parallel tracks—one being public installations and the other being works conceived for gallery display—he seems to view these as two sides of the same coin. Bergen believes that he has a great deal of creative freedom to envision his installations, even when working within the confines of a proposal. On the flip side, he notes that when creating work destined for a gallery, there will still be parameters to work under in consultation with the gallery’s curator. His years as an architect—consistently creating proposals, building teams, and working with a variety of constituents—have provided invaluable on-the-job training no art classroom could teach.

Perhaps therein lies the key to his success—Bergen is simultaneously both an artist and a businessman. While his dreams of becoming an artist may have been placed on hold temporarily while pursuing a career as an architect, the skills honed from those years now propel his artistic vision.

being defined by the white cube gallery.”

There is an element of surprise for visitors to be found in the unforeseen offerings in the goat barn at MARC. Artists proved their deep connection with the land, its resources, as well as the natural and environmental conditions on multiple platforms: artists Nizette Brennan and Cat Lukens investigated childhood memory, and illuminated the inherent natural beauty in farming, and the rich diversity of crops cultivated from colonial times to the present. Allan Arp took the perspective from the animals’ side: “Walking into an occupied barn you are always on view.” His work is a playful juxtaposition exposing issues of observation. Brothers Chase and Dane Winkler incorporate artificial light and sound into their conceptual work in combination with natural materials such as soil, compost, or straw. Incorporating digital sounds gathered from inside the barns at Salem Art Works is a reflection on the contrasting world of technology and agricultural roots. Fabiola Alvarez and Casey Snyder’s collaboration consisting of a simple installation of plastic foils photographed as they interact with the daily sun passing through the barn space do not explain themselves at first sight. This installation creates its own complex beauty through the change of light that can be observed through documented photographs and a mapping system. Simple beauty and the craft-informed work of Mahy Polymeropoulos communicates with the structure and concept of a barn itself. A Kingdom of Gold by Elsabé Dixon, Connie Fleres, and Artemis Herber refers to a Grimm’s fairy tale “Rumpelstilzchen,” and recalls contemporary expressions of nostalgia and transformation, using “useless” material such as repurposed cardboard as a value indicator for a market economy. Focusing on one material found in a barn, straw or hay. c.l.bigelow creates a magical and visual appeal of this material that dazzles the senses.

Art does not explain itself easily; it makes us think and motivates us to start an active dialogue that can be challenging. The MARC program presents work by sculptors who use materials, form, space, and place to create a deep connection with the site itself, presenting surprising juxtapositions of natural and common materials. All projects reveal intersections between the practice of agriculture and studio arts of today. Next year’s theme for the 4 Seasons Project will relate to the theme of Play & Interaction. There will be one call only for entry to all four programs. Artists will be able to apply for that call in the early spring of 2016. A WSG-selected body of jurors consisting of a team from MARC and selected curators familiar with Land Art and eco-relevant projects will decide which artist/artwork will be selected for each season of the LAND&ART@MARC: A 4 Season Project.

Micro-Monuments Exhibition in Germany

The Washington Sculptors Group exhibition, in collaboration with Salzlandmuseum, is located at the museum at 39218 Schönebeck, Pfännerstr. 41, Germany (www.museum.salzlandkreis.de). The exhibition closes on February 28, 2016.

The juror, Anne Reeve, serves as assistant curator at the Glenstone Museum in Potomac, MD. Her writing has appeared in Art in America and Art Papers, and she is currently at work on a publication to accompany Glenstone’s current exhibition of works by late American artist Fred Sandback (at the museum through February 2016).

Artemis Herber, curator of the Transatlantic Cultural Project of Sacony-Anhalt, Germany, devised and made possible the Micro-Monuments exhibition with Salzlandmuseum; Dr. Ines Engelmann served as the co-curator in Germany; Tom Petzwinkler acted as the Exhibition Manager; and Judith Pratt assisted as copy editor.

Thirty-two small-scale sculptures created within a “micro” format convey a global perspective that is informed either by the artist’s own personal background, or by experiences with other cultures and peoples internationally or locally. Their global perspectives and diverse artistic approaches interact with concepts of monumentality with regard to space, time, place, and cultural understanding.

The contextual analysis and exploration of this site through art projects is intended to reveal a deeper understanding of people’s lives in prehistoric times, and allow artists’ interpretation on topics of the cosmos, nature, and contemporary culture, as well as past and future societies.

Local excavations of four circular grave systems between the villages of Schönebeck and Pömmelte-Zackmünde have revealed an ancient monument site called the “German Woodhenge.” Inspired by the mysterious site at Schönebeck, Germany, the 23 artists created small sculptures to generate a dialogue regarding the surrounding excavation sites and the extraordinary scientific findings in the overall context of prehistoric monuments across cultures.
